

The Ploughman.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 11, 1878.

The syndicate has called for five millions more of bonds, making twenty-five of the fifty millions it agreed to take of the Secretary of the Treasury. Resumption is assured.

The syndicate has taken the peace in Europe as a great success. The Casas have taken into their own hands, and made serious business of it. A much better feeling prevails in England, and tranquility prevails everywhere. The influence of these peace rumors on our home market for grain is of course slightly depressing.

The Communistic demonstrations from Pennsylvania to St. Louis are attracting much attention and exciting more or less apprehension. It will be a sorry day when labor and capital come into open conflict with one another in this country.

The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations has reported a concurrent resolution, in respect to Chinese immigration, declaring that unrestricted immigration from China, under the provisions of the existing treaty, is to be prohibited.

The National House of Representatives resolved by only one vote to consider the tariff bill. It is not likely to pass at the last, if this is its utmost strength at the beginning.

The stockholders of the Sagamore Mills at Fall River find their debts half a million dollars in excess of their assets, and have voted to go into bankruptcy.

The cotton manufacturers of England have just closed their mills, which creates an immense lockout.

Within the past ten years no less than 12,000,000 acres of forest have been cut down or burned over in the United States. Most of this timber is pine, though five cities being on record as consuming 5,000,000 acres yearly. Farmers use up many more acres and sleepers require a product of 150,000 acres yearly. The amount of pine and lumber timber yet standing in the United States is no longer known. A sum of $144,000,000 is estimated to be invested in the pine lumber industry, employing 200,000 men.

Liquid manures contain a large amount of nitrogen and are especially beneficial to the grass crop.

The Poet's Corner.

IN THE APPLE-TREE.

BY MARY WILKINS.

Right into the heart of it--why Robin!
Why, didn't you know that the apple-tree,
When she gets her wonderful, fragrant blossoms,
Is a real spring-angel in white and rose?
(Now hear him singing to mock at me!)

Why your nest is in there, you darling Robin,
And you're a most brown lady in there, too--
Pansy's on the ceiling, and the room,
With the ceiling frescoed, in rose bloom,
Upon a ground of celestial blues.

Here's to your health, you blessed Robin,
And the next best thing is must surely be
To bring an angel in bliss above,
To live with your little ones and the apple-tree.

THE PROPHETY.

AN EPISODE THAT WON A WIFE.

"Give me a man--he has courage!" In my eyes, a man of masculine character.

"You are such an enthusiast on that subject, Louise," said Blanche Underwood, as she stood before the mirror in their private parlor, and, with a smile, turned to me for that quality, you'll overlook the want of some other, and find who have made a grievous blunder."

"Can't help it if I do. It's my nature to work at that quality--in a man especially--though I admire it in any one. He may be plain looking, but he is glorified form in my eyes--dark, dignified, and strong."

And Louise's white fingers lay over her reclining position on the lounge.

"And you don't think Redmond Clarke has come to Blanche?" I interrogated, turning to look at the fair, flushed face of her companion.

"I suppose I don't," said the other with a smile, "but the young things of these blonde men show courage--don't you think it's consistent with their natures. If Redmond Clark ever gains my heart he will have to prove himself a man of some unquestionable quality."

"There is more as well as physical beauty," quickly suggested Blanche. "I don't think my cousin is deficient in the former."

"Physical daring is the outward and seal of moral courage. But we shan't have to drop our discussion. Here comes the man."

The head a tread on the stairs, then the door swung open and Redmond entered.

A careless, free and easy, a genitally bearing. Undeniably handsome, if one admired the style. Louise professed to despise--blonde, moustache, indolent-looking eyes, very broad head.

"I have very little to say, ladies," he said, as he threw himself, with easy chair, into the depths of a comfortable chair, and plashed his back heavy hair from a broad white hand.

"No. I didn't guess they deal in such a commodity in this quiet place," said Blanche.

"Perhaps it isn't local news," suggested Louise, "but I have heard of it."

Redmond Clarke noticed the contrast between the glowing colors and her snow-white fingers.

"It is local news with a vengeance. A prophecy uttered by a seer six years ago regarding this town is the eve of fulfillment."

"Please explain," said both, with growing interest.

"To-morrow night this hotel known as the Cossatot House, a two-story of two miles from us, in all directions included, is a black, and I suppose, an indolent-looking man, the morning sun is to rise over a broad expanse of water, which has covered the doomed inhabitants."

"Hush!" said Louise, impatiently.

"We were unfortunate in our selection of a spot to rusticate," pursued Redmond, watching Louise closely, without seeming to notice, as he came to her, that she had been following his appearance with a white, with his eyes, and was aware of his movements.

"Suppose we make a short visit to Ashland, and return to Boston. We'll have a week when the dangerous period has passed," laughed Blanche.

"There's the dinner-table," and the conversation ended somewhat abruptly. The trio descended into the quiet, cool-dining-room, and took their seats at the table.

"To-morrow night this hotel known as the Cossatot House, a two-story of two miles from us, in all directions included, is a black, and I suppose, an indolent-looking man, the morning sun is to rise over a broad expanse of water, which has covered the doomed inhabitants."

"Hush!" said Louise, impatiently.

"We were unfortunate in our selection of a spot to rusticate," pursued Redmond, watching Louise closely, without seeming to notice, as he came to her, that she had been following his appearance with a white, with his eyes, and was aware of his movements.

"Suppose we make a short visit to Ashland, and return to Boston. We'll have a week when the dangerous period has passed," laughed Blanche.

"There's the dinner-table," and the conversation ended somewhat abruptly. The trio descended into the quiet, cool-dining-room, and took their seats at the table.

"It is local news with a vengeance. A prophecy uttered by a seer six years ago regarding this town is the eve of fulfillment."

"Please explain," said both, with growing interest.
